

Many people started their lifelong experiences as archaeologists and geologists by first discovering the world through the wonders of children's literature. Andre Norton, Ray Bradbury, and Jules Verne were all hugely popular authors that shaped how we think about science and Earth science. Kids (and adults) can now use these essays and descriptions to learn more about the natural world through a lifetime of reading. They should go right for "How People Study Our Planet". This is not only an informative article but it is also a neat example of what you should expect from other literature published by Oxford University Press. The series explains how to look for clues and peer into the past to learn more about how humans interact with the environment. For example, we know we need to find a way to reduce carbon dioxide in the atmosphere that is causing global warming. In "One View of Climate Change", authors Robert M. Hazen and Mark P. Waldrop provide a clear explanation of the problem and what we have learned from this field of study. In "A New View from Space", Piers Sellers accurately identifies the tools available for scientists wishing to learn more about climate change, especially satellites launched into space by ships, airplanes or through space exploration vehicles such as the Hubble Telescope.
